The Ned Kelly Story

Ned Kelly was a teenage horse thief, fearless horseman and an outstanding boxer, but he was involved in a series of squalid fights and thefts and while still a youth had spent considerable time behind cell doors. What made Kelly truly famous was the fact he wore homemade body armour and a helmet.

His career from boyhood on is an exonerable scenario that leads ultimately to the monumental events - the shooting of three policemen, the Bank hold-up at Euroa, and the siege at Glenrowan. The thrilling events were given even more colour because Kelly was a voluble, and at times, remarkably erudite spokesman for his cause such as it was.

The final shoot out was an extraordinarily public affair, one could have almost booked tickets. In 1880 more than a thousand people gathered at Glenrowan, mostly on the railway station to witness the monumental event. News travelled fast that the Kelly gang was holed up by police at the Jones Hotel.

Scores were to be settled, history was about to be made and the crowd watched perilously close.

Ned Kelly for reasons never satisfactorily explained, left the Hotel during the siege and was brought down in the scrub by shots to the legs. The wounded Kelly arrived at Melbourne railway station on a stretcher.

The court proceedings dominated the conversations of the day; every celebrated exchange was reported and embellished, but the result was inevitable.

Sentenced to be hanged by the neck until dead by Judge Barry, Kelly caused a sensation in court by telling the Judge that he would meet him again where he was going. Executed at the old Melbourne gaol on November the 11th 1880 he is alleged to have said 'such is life' as the noose was tightened. His head was cut off to make the death mask of the face that lurked behind the iron mask and the skin from his face was said to have been made into a tobacco pouch. Judge Barry died shortly after...
